Alone in a Crowd Paul Grenert

In ALONE IN A CROWD, Thunder, the protagonist, battles neurological brain disease: a deadly combination of depression and schizophrenia. The disease ravages his mind and his entire life: his job as a tennis professional, all his relationships, even his solitary time are at stake. He does everything in his power to fight it. He initiates a couple of relationships that begin positively before the disease turns them sour. He takes the prescribed medication, but it doesn't fully work, and he doesn't like the side effects. So he resorts to street drugs and alcohol to try to alleviate the symptoms. His illness gets him into serious trouble.

I think readers will find this novel very timely. It comes at a time when people are attempting to better understand mental illness: that it is a disease like any other physical disease. Many people still don't grasp that it is not something one can control with willpower; rather, it is the chemicals in the brain gone wrong.
